THE TRIAL

"Equal and exact justice to all men.....; trial by juries impartially selected....." this and much more is to be found in Washingtonb First Inaugural Address in the year 1801. When our first President wrote, we had emerged, shakily, from our struggle for freedom. Washington knew history and he knew well how Justice had been prostituted in the past, and how political events could influence courts and judges.

Of all the great trials held in the world from the time of Socrates, accused of blaspheming the Olympic gods, I suppose there was not one but held in it the element of tragedy, if not for the victim, at least for his judges and for those responsible for those same judges. Centuries after, Our Saviour stood before Pontius Pilate. Then Joan of Arc passed, and a British King, on trial for infringing the civil liberties of his subjects, was tried and executed. There was called before the Bar of Justice a great colonial governor, impeached for despoiling and enslaving the people of India. Many others, too, have come and gone, among them Mary Stuart and Robert Emmet. In our own land we tried and set free, perhaps justly, Aaron Burr, third Vice-President of the Republic, accused of the blackest crime which can be committed against a nation, the crime of treason.

Perhaps in none of these great epochal trials was public opinion so divided as in that of Alfred Dreyfus, which will ever be remembered if only for the impassioned defense of the accused by Emile Zola. To his friends it has been said that Dreyfus was a Prometheus, bound to an ocean-girt rock while the vulture of exile preyed upon his heart; to his enemies he was, no doubt, a Judas who betrayed, not God or Christ, but France.

Now we have just witnessed another dramatic event, the Riom trial in which six Frenchmen have faced their judges charged with the responsibility for bringing France into the war and with other crimes. It is no matter that the authority of a sovereign state happens to be absent and that France is in bondage to a conqueror. It is no matter that judgment, pronounced, will be in the nature of political revenge and dictated by the will of a foreigner - the trial goes on and the integrity of the judges is relatively unimportant.

Some brilliant duels have occurred during the trial, but no matter what the evidence, no matter what the outcome, it has been known from the beginning that behind the curtain and the robes of the judges an unseen hand pulled the strings. In spite of the tragedy the world has been treated to a Punch and Judy Show.
